Tricks for Sick Youngsters

The convalescent child is sometimes a tax on ingenuity when it comes to keeping him quiet, in bed, and also happily entertained.

Miss Amelia Fuller, home economics specialist at VPI, has some suggestions to keep happy the 4- to-10 year-old when is "on the mend."

She says to provide plenty of "first looking" activities. A gay ballet, dances or airplane hanging on a string from a light fixture or a window shade will catch and hold his interest. Or arrange a bulletin board near the foot of the bed. Each day add a new surprise, a new member of an imaginary family, a new animal or bird, or anything else which amuses him.

Many a child has been amused by the simple device of catching sunlight with a pocket mirror. When it begins to get dark, a mineature flashlight will bring him minutes of pleasure when he explores dark corners.

"Surprise" is a magic word to a child. Plan a simple, gayly wrapped surprise box. The anticipation of opening a package every day will help keep the youngster quiet and patient. The gifts need not be purchased. A cookie brightly wrapped, or post cardi a picture book, a pipe cleaner doll, funny drawings, or even a paper party hat will entertain a child.

A picture puzzle can be made for a young child from a picture post card. Cut the card into four or five irregular shapes. If the child can read, write a message on the back of it before it is cut into a puzzle. Your child might enjoy cutting and sending a puzzle message to some of his friends.

Even paper work can be fun for the child. Wrapping paper, paper bags, colored paper, paper dollies, paper plates, greeting cards, and old magazines can be used. With a pair of sharp, but blunt, scissors and paper, the child can be kept occupied for a long time.

Don't give your child too much. One toy or activity at a time is enough. Then don't allow the child's bed to become cluttered, for it is confusing and tiring to the child, and extra work for you. Keep a large tray with a raised edge, a carton with its sides cut down, or a large box lid, handy for all the scattered toys and odds and ends.

When your child is better, don't coddle him. The attitudes he builds during an illness may carry over to other things. Try to help him treat illness as one of those things which happens to everyone occasionaally something to be cared for sensibly, but not over-emphasized.

Birds Cause Short Circuit

Ventura, Calif. — It was all right for a flock of waxwings to take a breather on a power line here recently. But, when they all took off simultaneously, the wire, bounced and hit another wire, causing a short circuit. Power to part of the city was out for half an hour.
